By now it is customary to engage the work of Rem Koolhaas in terms of its active alignment with processes of cultural transformation, its planned instabilities and flexible components—an architecture designed as a dynamic ingredient of perpetual social flux and reorganization. Delirious New York is frequently read as a manifesto outlining how architecture (and by implication other forms of cultural invention) could become immanent to a mutating field of modernization rather than function as static or enduring monuments exterior to it. And certainly Koolhaas's antiformalist urbanist thought proposes collaborating with, if not enacting, the uncontrolled forces of development rather than formulating anything self-consciously remedial that would attempt to rationalize or "solve" social disorder.

...not for its recognizable profile of Koolhaas's work, it is also important to grasp the low temperature ways, in which he is simultaneously seeking "against the grain" of modernization. For his opposition is not against the idea of modernization, but rather against the notion of modernity. He is working against the idea of modernization, he is working against the idea of modernity, he is working against the idea of modernization, he is working against the idea of modernity.
